KNOM pioneer Busch dies at 63

Tom Busch, the former general manager of KNOM radio, suffered a fatal heart attack Monday morning Nov. 1.

Busch moved to Nome in 1970 as volunteer chief engineer to design and build the radio station. Born in Philadelphia, he was a graduate of Boston College. In addition to KNOM, Busch worked as announcer and engineer for commercial stations WRYT in Boston, WLDB in Atlantic City, and KIAK in Fairbanks.

Busch served as KNOM's general manager from 1975 to 2005. He then resided in Anchorage where he focused on fundraising for the mission. Busch kept close ties to the station's regular operations; he regularly lent his expertise to engineering repairs and preventive maintenance at KNOM's facilities.

Busch and wife Florence, who was business manager for KNOM from 1989-2005, have two children, Katie and Steve, both grown.

Tom was an Extra Class amateur radio operator (call sign NL7H). He enjoyed computer science, astronomy, reading and wilderness backpacking and was in the process of writing his fourth novel.

In 2004, Boston College honored Busch with an honorary Doctor of Humane Letters degree.

Busch will be sorely missed. He helped to create and sustain KNOM in Nome. Nov. 1 was his birthday. Funeral services are pending.

Write-in list spurs court battle; count process could take weeks

Editor's note: The Nome Nugget will have full election result coverage in next week's issue. Results were unavailable with polls closing just as the Nugget went to press.

The 2010 midterm election has drawn nationwide attention to Alaska's senatorial race as incumbent and write-in candidate Lisa Murkowski tried to save her seat against Tea Party-backed Republican Joe Miller and Democrat Scott McAdams.

As of press time on election day, the results of the vote were unknown.

Faced with the unusual write-in campaign of a major candidate, the Alaska Division of Elections gave out material to polling places that has been contested by the leadership of the Alaska Democratic and Republican parties. Both parties filed a lawsuit against the Alaska Division of Elections, its director Gail Fenumiai and Murkowski, to stop the practice of providing lists with the names of write-in candidates. Once early voting began Oct. 18, the division offered

Mining firm Millrock Resources busy east of Nome

By Tyler Rhodes

While the future of the Rock Creek mine just north of Nome is in limbo, another mining firm is testing the waters—or the rocks, more accurately—east of Nome to see if larger-scale commercial mining is feasible. Vancouver-based Millrock Resources spent last summer conducting separate drilling programs east of Nome near Council and Bluff.

Teamed with large Canadian mining company Kinross Gold Corp., Millrock drilled 17 holes in the Council area at what it calls the Albion prospect. The company also conducted extensive soil testing in the area, tak-

Search continues for missing Savoonga man

Searchers in Nome as of Tuesday morning were still hunting for a missing 20-year-old who police say was last seen stumbling down Front Street on Friday, Oct. 29.

The Nome Police Department has asked residents to check around their property for any sign of Jeconiah Annogiyuk. The young Alaska Native man from Savoonga was reported last seen walking out of Nome's Subway restaurant and heading west toward downtown on Front Street. There has been no sign of him since.

Police say Annogiyuk had been drinking and was kicked out of Subway. Annogiyuk was reportedly stumbling as he left the restaurant. Annogiyuk is described as approximately 5'6" to 5'10" tall and weighing 140 to 150 lbs. He has a slight mustache and was wearing a brown hoodie sweatshirt, a black jacket, blue jeans and white shoes.

The police and search and rescue teams first issued an alert to look for Annogiyuk on Sunday. The search continued Monday with searchers on foot and a Bering Air helicopter making passes over the seawall and elsewhere in Nome to try to locate the missing man.

Searchers are asking residents to examine their property to check for Annogiyuk. They ask that people check around woodpiles, outbuildings, cars that may not be used often, under their homes and other areas where a person may lie down or seek refuge. Anyone with any information regarding Annogiyuk or his whereabouts is asked to call the Nome Police Department at (907) 443-5262.

Dear Editor,

To the people around the Norton Sound —there is a problem with law enforcement not doing their job right! They seem to be only harassing people who have been to jail before. The ones that haven't— as in higher-class people — they seem to do nothing about it! We hear about other people breaking the law and they seem to do nothing about it. They seem to harass the people who are on probation when they aren't doing anything wrong. When their family members break the law they don't' do anything about it!

Hearsay is one of the problems they believe in. Anybody could say anything about that person when they're on probation and they seem to pick them up right away, even when they have done nothing wrong! Sorry to say, but something needs to be done to those who really do something wrong instead of harassing those who been to jail before.

Thanks, have a safe and wonderful winter.

Editorial

It's Over (For Now)

Just as we get ready to sit down for supper the phone rings. There is a long empty pause and then a slick-talking recorded voice says, "Did you know that ... blah, blah, blah..." We hang up and the phone rings a few minutes later as we are seated at the table. There is another long pause, followed by rapid-fire "Vote for ..." The rude interruptions, expletive omitted, are the scourge of the campaign dollars. They are almost as bad as the junk email that fills our computers and the flier that overload our post office boxes. How fast can we hang up, hit delete or the trashcan?

The television ads are even more disgusting with bear poop and manure slinging attacks on the opposition. The negativity and meaningless rhetoric are an insult to the voter who wants to be informed. It's been said that about 80 percent of political campaign advertising is composed of lies and half-truths. As Election Day approaches the quantity goes up and the quality of the ads goes down. Ideally, a political ad should tell us a candidate's views and why we should vote for them. It should also include a clear statement of who is paying for the ad, not just a hastily mumbled delivery of a bogus name of some flimflam organization.

We are in need of campaign reform, but we should not hold our breath and expect elected politicians to cook their own golden goose. Hopefully voters will reject the mudslingers and elect the candidates with the most informative and least offensive advertising campaign. We can dream.

News from around Alaska

Compiled by Diana Haecker Man tortured and murdered in Bethel

Three men have been arrested in connection with a murder in Bethel. Police called the killing of 19-yearold Benjamin Kaiser of Hooper Bay prolonged and torturous. Police are still investigating the case. The Tundra Drums reports that Kaiser was beaten across his entire body. Police chief Larry Elarton says two men were arrested in Bethel on murder charges, Harry Ned Williams, 32 and Jeffrey Allan Hout, 46.

At least part of the beating took place in a shed behind Hout's house, where blood was found. Elarton says the beating seems to have centered around a property dispute. David Kenney, 37, was also arrested. Kenney was reportedly the owner of a pickup truck that the two suspects were torturing Benjamin Kaiser about. Kenney is said to have witnessed some of the torture and did not report it. He is charged with hindering prosecution. Williams and Hout are charged with first-degree homicide.

Man shot to death in Talkeetna

A 53-year old longshoreman was shot to death in a family restaurant and lodge in Talkeetna on Friday night. The shooter, 40-year-old Samuel Clark was arrested shortly after fleeing the scene. The victim, Dirk Fast, had a conversation with Clark at the time when Clark suddenly pulled his gun and shot Fast pointblank in the chest. Troopers are still investigating the case. This is the first shooting murder that occurred in Talkeetna.

Shell and North Slope Borough pair up for scientific research

AP- Shell Alaska and the North Slope Borough said last week that they entered into an agreement to collaborate on scientific research aimed at concerns about petroleum drilling on Alaska's Arctic Ocean outer continental shelf.

The agreement covers five years, with $2 million allocated by Shell for 2010 and 2011. Shell's plans for the short open water drilling season in 2010 were put on hold by the federal government after the Deepwater Horizon spill. Interior Secretary Ken Salazar imposed a suspension on drilling over concerns about what a blowout could do in Arctic waters, where foul weather is legendary and there is far less infrastructure along the coast that could aid in a cleanup effort.

The borough has been critical of drilling plans as it seeks to protect residents who depend on the ocean for a subsistence lifestyle that includes hunting whales, other marine mammals and birds. Shell Alaska vice president Pete Slaiby said the program, guided by a steering committee with community members, opens up the research process to incorporate traditional knowledge and concerns of residents. Projects could focus on anything from marine organisms to the flow of the ocean, he said.

AFN launches fifth round of Alaska Marketplace

The Alaska Federation of Natives rolled out the fifth Alaska Marketplace idea and business competition. This time AFN didn't make a big announcement of the competition that has in the past four rounds awarded small business start-ups in Alaska with $1.5 million.

AFN president Julie Kitka told The Nome Nugget that this year's competition is a little bit different as it not only awards money to small businesses but also to ideas that provide solutions to rural Alaska challenges. Ideas can be submitted in five different categories. Kitka said the competition fund is about $300,000 strong so far, to be distributed among 20 or so finalists. The sponsors of the competition are BP, Conoco Phillips, the Denali Commission and Mitsubishi International.

therapists pass Dental muster, finds evaluation

RTI International of Research Triangle Park, N.C., the Rasmuson Foundation and the Bethel Community Services Foundation conducted a twoyear study that found that dental health aide therapists in Alaska are providing safe dental services. The dental therapist program has been questioned since its inception in Alaska in 2005 by the American Dental Association.

ADA sued, but the dental health aide program prevailed because it is governed by federal Indian Health legislation. The evaluation assessed the work of dental therapists in five communities, as well as the experience of hundreds of patients and how dental therapists performed on hundreds of procedures. They were directly observed performing sealant placement, composite and amalgam preparations, stainless steel crown placement, and oral health instruction.

Key findings of the evaluation were that dental therapists are technically competent to perform the procedures within their scope of work, they are doing so safely and that they work under the general supervision of dentists. The findings also include that dental therapists are successfully treating cavities and helping to relieve pain for people who often had to wait months or travel hours to seek treatment, and that patients were very satisfied with the care they received, and that they are well-accepted in tribal villages.

Tribal leader launches website to connect villages

Mike Williams, 14-time Iditarod mushing veteran, sobriety advocate, Akiak resident and Alaska Native tribal leader acquired a social media website networking called AlaskanVillages.org. Williams said that on this website, every rural village has its own individual web page that enables the villagers to post messages, classified ads, obituaries, birth announcements and anything else that they would like to say to the community along with posting videos, pictures and music.

Spotted Seals protected in China, not in Alaska

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration found that two small populations of spotted seals in China and Russia are threatened under the Endangered Species Act due to the loss of sea ice. However, NOAA has denied protections for larger spotted seal populations, about 98 percent of the species, suffering from sea-ice loss in Alaskan waters. The decision formalizes protection for small populations in Liaodong Bay in China and Peter the Great Bay in Russia due to the threats from diminishing sea ice. Spotted seals use the edge of the sea ice away from predators as safe habitat for giving birth and rearing their pups in winter and spring; loss, thinning and early breakup of the ice threaten the seals' ability to raise young. NOAA had previously denied ESA protection for the ribbon seal. In May 2008, the Center for Biological Diversity filed a petition to protect ice-dependent spotted seals, bearded seals and ringed seals under the Endangered Species Act due to threats from global warming and increasing oil development. A finding on whether listing is warranted for the ringed and bearded seals is due by the end of the year. The center is currently challenging the agency's decision to deny Endangered Species Act protection to the ribbon seal.

Dr. Karen O'Neill reappointed to EMS council

Governor Sean Parnell reappointed Dr. Karen O'Neill to the Alaska Council on Emergency Medical Services. The council advises the commissioner of Health and Social Services and the governor on planning and implementation of the emergency medical services system. O'Neill, of Nome, is the medical director of Norton Sound Regional Hospital. She has served as a medical provider in the Nome region since 1975, including service with Emergency Medicine Associates and Norton Sound Health Corporation, O'Neill is reappointed to a seat reserved for an Alaska Native health care organization administrator.

ing a total of 1,990 samples used for performing geochemistry surveys. The exploration program, which was budgeted for $800,000, aimed to find hard-rock gold deposits in upland areas around historic placer mining operations.

An Oct. 22 press release issued by Millrock labeled the surface work as encouraging. It noted that while two of the 17 drill holes encountered bedrock gold mineralization, the drilling as a whole failed to test what the company described as "anticipated structural and stratigraphic targets."

Millrock has three groups of claims in the Council area aimed at finding the source that fed placer operations along the Niukluk River and Ophir and Albion creeks. The claims cover approximately 350 square miles. Some of the claims are established through the state while others are subject to an agreement made with Bering Straits Native Corp., which owns lands within the claim area. Some of the surface lands in the area are owned by Council Native Corp.

Millrock was also busy this summer at Bluff, approximately 15 miles east of the Big Hurrah gold deposit near the Bering Sea coast. Millrock concentrated its efforts at what it calls the Daniel's Creek zone, drilling 24 holes at depths of approximately 130 meters. The company said in an Oct. 20 press release that the drilling confirmed gold mineralization in the deposit.

The approximately 90-squaremile Bluff prospect, which Millrock is exploring with partner Valdez Gold, covers land where the subsurStraits Native Corp. and the surface rights belong to White Mountain Native Corp. Under its agreement with Bering Straits Native Corp., Millrock also face rights are owned by Bering has rights to explore near Ungalik in the southwestern corner of Norton Bay, northeast of Shaktoolik. The mining corporation has not reported any exploration work undertaken or planned for the area.

Lee sentenced to 10 years in death of son

By Sandra L. Medearis

People have been saying bad things about his client, the public defender told the court. Small town rumors would extend Frank David Lee's sentence beyond the 10 years handed down last week. Bob Lewis said.

What Lee, of Teller, said about himself in court when he pleaded guilty to criminal negligent homicide was that he had killed his baby son by shaking him. What court records say about Lee is that he has a string of prior convictions.

Lee, 36, had a sentence hearing Oct. 29 after pleading guilty in July to a felony charge of criminally negligent homicide, reduced from two counts of murder in the death of 7month-old Harley Dickson from child abuse-"shaken baby syndrome" in October 2008. The guilty plea to the lesser felony cancelled Lee's trial on the two counts of murder that a grand jury handed up in July 2009.

Last fall, Tammy Dickson, Harley's mom, hanged herself in her father's house. A few months later, Harley's grandfather, Strom Dickson of Teller, died of a heart attack.

People are saying bad things about Lee, Lewis said.

"Mr. Lee has been recipient of the rumor mill and gossip mill with [information] that far exceeds the facts," Lewis said. "Comments of the community that go toward the chain of events involving misinformation and gossipy things are following this horrible event," Lewis said in a presentence statement.

Just the facts are bad enough.

Eva Dickson, Harley's aunt, told the court before sentencing that a day didn't go by that she did not think of her nephew, her sister Tammy and their father.

Eva Dickson sat in the first row of the jury box where she could use the microphone.

"It has impacted my whole family," Eva Dickson said. She spoke of her father's death. She spoke of Tammy Dickson being distraught over not having custody of one child and distraught over the loss of her son Harley, believing that Harley needed her.

"She took her own life to be with one of her children," Eva Dickson said. "When he murdered Harley, he took three people."

Before the sentencing, Eva Dickson said the family would finally have closure, too long in coming. "I have waited too long for this day," she said.

Lee had written a statement, he said, "but I forgot it in my room.

"I accept this punishment. This is going to follow me a long way," he said. "I apologize to everyone I've hurt.'

Judge Ben Esch said Lee had not shown remorse. Additionally, he had prior convictions and charges, some as a juvenile and several misdemeanor assaults as an adult. His record under a previous parole "had not been great," the judge said.

Esch said he believed the maximum sentence of 10 years suitable just by "your conduct in this case." The lesser charge of criminally negligent homicide was a compromise. Lee had made a handful of motions asking for charges to be dismissed.

Prosecutor Gregg Olson attended the sentencing by telephone.

This was a serious case, the death of a child, a young, vulnerable child unable to protect itself. Lee's crime left another child of Tammy Dickson without a biological mother and without a biological father, Olson said.

'These cases have victims beyond immediate victims," he said.

People incarcerated with Lee at Anvil Mountain Correctional Center also said bad things about Lee, according to court hearing documents. At a bail hearing, a former inmate witness reported that Lee spoke of getting drugs after his release and positioning himself on the side of the road to harm Alaska State Troopers, according to court documents. Prosecutors contended that Lee's release would pose a risk to the community.

As a result, the court rescinded his bail and reset bail at $15,000 at a Sept. 29 hearing.

Lee has now completed voluntary alcohol treatment, Lewis said.

Esch acknowledged that effort as a very positive example for others. Shaken Baby Syndrome is a form of child abuse where the abuser violently shakes a baby or small child creating a whiplash motion causing acceleration-deceleration injuries that can lead to death or severe brain injuries. Lee will be eligible for discretionary parole after he has served 40 months, Esch said Monday. After 80 months, he will be eligible for mandatory parole, if he follows rules.

Esch said he expected Lee, now incarcerated, to be transferred to a prison in Colorado. The indictment followed a nine-month investigation by law enforcement.

Dead bowhead found tangled in commercial pot gear

Submitted by Craig George, North Slope Borough Senior Wildlife Biologist

A dead bowhead whale found floating in the southern Chukchi Sea in July likely drowned while entangled in commercial pot gear.

The gear is the type commonly used in Bering Sea commercial fisheries for crab and cod. The whale was found by biologists from the National Marine Fisheries Service and local hunters working on a seal study. Over the years, several bowhead whales have been found entangled in lines consistent with pot fisheries, but this is the first whale in which the gear type could be positively identified.

The 45-foot female bowhead was first reported approximately 23 miles northeast of Shishmaref, near Cape Espenburg, on the northern Seward Peninsula. The whale was entangled in more than 115 feet of rope attached to a 20-pound metal corner section from a crab or cod pot. Rope associated with the pot was tightly secured to the whale's tail and head.

Three weeks after the initial sighting, a biologist from the Alaska Department of Fish and Game examined the whale where it washed ashore 30 miles south of Kotzebue on the western shore of the Baldwin Peninsula. The whale was in an advanced state of decomposition; however, it could still be positively each year recognized by markings on its left side. Based on the types of injuries and gear, it was clear that the whale had not been killed during the legal subsistence harvest.

"Compared to similar species in the North Atlantic, such as right whales, fishing gear entanglement in Alaskan bowheads is uncommon," said Dr. Michael Moore of the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution. "However, for every dead entangled animal there will likely be a larger number of sublethally impacted animals. This case will be a harbinger of more cases, if fixed gear fisheries and bowhead whales increase their co-existence in time and

Worldwide, entanglement in fishing gear is a major source of mortality for whales. Biologists have estimated more than 100,000 small and large whale species die each year from entanglements in nets, pot and other fishing gear. A surprising number of bowhead whales harvested for subsistence in the western Arctic population show scars from past entanglement injuries and is a concern to the communities that rely on bowheads. Finding dead bowheads with ropes or fisheries gear attached to them is uncommon; however it is unknown how many bowheads (from the Bering-Chukchi-Beaufort sea stock) die in commercial fishing gear holder. Only a few of the houses are truly ripe for abatement, several council members said. Others are in need of repair. Other unclaimed jewels have been neatly boarded up and made safe from hazardous, drinking parties and skulduggerous play.

Papasodora drove around town and put together a slide show of waiting-to-be-prime real estate. He screened the slides at a noon Council work session Oct. 28. The Council is getting ready to ride herd-once again—on derelict buildings cluttering neighborhoods of otherwise well-kept abodes showing vigorous pride of ownership.

The Council several years ago assembled a packet of house listings with the edict that they be cleaned up in one year. Owners have squared away a few; others are still on the list

Nome city law has Chapter 5.30 to deal with hazardous and abandoned structures that provides for hearings, abatements and gives definitions of conditions that make a building unsafe. City officers can nominate structures as fire hazards, health hazards or public nuisances, after which the Council publicizes a hearing to determine if an order for abatement

If the City then declares a building a hazard or nuisance, the owner or his agent has 14 days to remove the building or the City will do it for him. That's what it says. But before the removal begins, the owner or agent can ask for another hearing to show that improvements have been made or are underway.

Should the City remove the building, the cost is chargeable to the building. The salvaged material may be sold at public auction and any remaining cost be held against the land.

Papasodora had a problem with the City's law: It has no teeth, no penalty, he said. The way the law is written, it is hard to enforce.

The Council had a minor problem with Papasodora's overhead presentation: No hard copy list of addresses that they might use for driving around to review the buildings themselves. Papasodora will make a list so the Council can check it twice.

At the end of the meeting, most people in the Council Chambers had the same question: "Why wasn't the Wien Building, Front Street's anchor eyesore for decades, on the list?"

The chief was fast on the draw. "That one is so obvious, I didn't need to list it," he said.

Lights, cameras and busses top school board agenda

Schools Public Superintendent Jon Wehde put the discussion over security cameras back on the table at the Oct. 26 Nome Board of Education work session.

Wehde previously broached the subject with the board at a meeting this summer, saying the cameras would be particularly beneficial for outside security at both the elementary and high schools. He reiterated that view at the Oct. 26 meeting, adding that indoor cameras are "a viable question for the board."

For the outside areas, Wehde said the playground at the elementary school and the pick-up and drop-off areas at both schools would be obvious targets for security cameras. A discussion on how and where

President Gloria Karmun. "In this day and age I think it would be a great investment," she said.

Brighter lights, lower bills

The school board work session included a short tour through the elementary school to get a peek at new LED lights installed in a classroom. The energy-sipping lights give off a crisp, bright white light when compared to the fluorescent lights commonly found in schools.

Bill Potter from the district's maintenance department led the tour, telling board members that the new lights have been placed in the Nome-Beltz maintenance shop and slashed its energy consumption by 200 kwh. He said the lights have been sourced from Bering Straits Native Corp.

service back to the door of the Anvil City Science Academy charter school. Students who attend the school are dropped off with those attend Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High. The charter school is located on the same campus as the main school, but is housed in the same building as the district office. The charter school students are required to cross the drive between the two buildings in the dark morning hours.

Wehde also said the district plans to put a lighted crosswalk sign near the crossing to alert motorists.

Wehde said having the busses make an extra stop for the charter school would cost the district more for the service.

The second bussing issue of the night was the continued discussion of whether a later bus should be scheduled in the afternoon at Nome-Beltz to accommodate students in after-school clubs or activities that cannot otherwise find a ride back into Nome. Wehde stressed the need to find out how many students would take advantage of the service, a difficult task without implementing the bus. "It costs money to know [ridership]," he said.

Prepare for one of Alaska's hot jobs with

He admitted that there are likely students who would participate in more activities if the later bus were available. "I think there are kids falling through the cracks," he said.

The issue was again batted around the table Oct. 26 with a pledge for further examination inside cameras may be used was saved for a later meeting.

Wehde said cameras, if installed, would not be generally monitored but would record footage that could be reviewed if needed. The superintendent said there could be a need for monitoring one area for the Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center at the Nome-Beltz campus, but deferred from giving more detail until NACTEC Director Doug Walrath could join him at a school board meeting.

Wehde said the cameras could be paid for through a federal grant that the City of Nome could obtain.

The presentation was the second installment in what Wehde said is a four-part emergency preparedness update he is delivering to the board. He said he would be presenting more information on security cameras as he studies the issue for the district.

At this early stage, the idea received support from School Board

Potter's tour included a stop in the elementary gym where he had hung a single LED light to display the contrast between it and the current bulbs. With just the LED light on, a white light cascaded down from the high gym ceiling. Potter then flipped on the current lights, and after a short wait for them to power up, a dull yellow light filled the room. Potter said it would roughly take two years to pay off the investment in the new lights through the energy savings they would yield.

The tour's final stop was in a fifth/sixth grade classroom. Again the visual aspect of the new lights was clear, but there was also an audio facet to the LED lights. Absent in the LED-lighted room was the hum that comes with traditional fluorescent lights.

Bussing concerns

Wehde told the board that the district is considering bringing bus

Teachers look to adapt Kennewick model to Nome

By Tyler Rhodes

A group of teachers who traveled to Washington state Oct. 4-6 to get a firsthand look at a school success story gave a near-breathless report to the Nome Board of Education Oct. 26 on what they saw and learned.

While board members lauded the group for their energetic response to the trip, they also questioned what will ultimately result from the expensive endeavor. "I appreciate your enthusiasm. I want to know how Nome Public Schools will benefit," said board president Gloria Karmun. "We've made this investment. They've gone to the Kennewick schools. Is there going to be an implementation timeline?"

Their answer to the board: We would like to do something similar, but it's not our job alone.

Administrator Jon Berkeley

The collaboration among the Kennewick staff went beyond teachers working with teachers. The Nome educators said a wide variety of staff delivered reading instruction at the schools, whether it was aides, the librarian, music teacher or the gym teacher. "It's a nice way to structure without having more people come in, utilizing what we have in a different way," Lammer said.

The teachers did acknowledge that by committing so much energy to the reading program, there were areas in the Kennewick schools that were put on a back burner. "It was so focused that other things that were equally as important may be negatively effected. Social studies time was not there for some students. Some students didn't get as much science time," Marvin said.

The rationale for the lopsided

"It wasn't just a building issue, it was district-wide piece. It was the community, it was the school board, it was the building principals, it wasn't just directed at teachers. It's an everybody thing."

- Mari Lammer

along, with teachers Krista Marvin, Korenek-Johnson, Lammer, Kris Busk and Meghan Ten Eyck, spoke at length about the instituted in the practices Kennewick, Wash., elementary schools that ultimately resulted in 90 percent of its third graders scoring proficient in reading. They told how the schools in the community made reading education the top priority through a concerted effort that involved the school board, administrators, teachers, support staff and even outside entities along with the community as a whole. "It wasn't just a building issue, it was district-wide piece, Lammer said. "It was the community, it was the school board, it was the building principals; it wasn't just directed at teachers.'

The group presenting to the board said they would like to take some ideas from the Kennewick schools to apply at Nome elementary, but noted that it will require a broad plan and a cohesive effort from all corners of the school district to make it happen. "It's an everybody thing," Lammer said.

Using a top-10 list as the backbone of their presentation the Nome teachers delved into what made the Kennewick system tick. The message boiled down to the fact that the Washington district had an unyielding, near singular focus on the goal of improving reading scores. The Nome contingent said reading instruction time at the schools was sacred, as were weekly meetings for teachers to collaborate. "Structuring the day to give kids the time needed was very important to making the proficiency goal," Busk said.

focus on reading was that if students could not read well, they had little hope of succeeding in other subjects. "If students could read proficiently, then students would perform better throughout their years in school," Busk said, summing up the Washington district's philosophy.

While the Kennewick district is similar to Nome in terms of serving a number of economically disadvantaged students and one cultural group that lags behind others in terms of achievement scores, it differs in its size. While Nome has a single elementary school and a combined junior-senior high school, Kennewick has 14 elementary schools, four middle schools and three high schools. While the difference in scale does not prohibit Nome's teachers from gleaning ideas from the larger district, it does present a challenge in implementing some of those ideas.

The Nome teachers said they did not want to simply try and replicate what was being done in Kennewick but did see the possibility of adapting some of the district's ideas. "We're not Kennewick and there are many different things from Kennewick," Busk said. "But we found out we can align ourselves with some of the things they are doing."

The Nome teachers identified a renewed effort to adhere to the school's reading program as the most immediate way to start improving the district's reading scores. They cited a need for increased training in the use and implementation of the reading curriculum. "We've only had one training on it or none for new teachers in the building. If you don't have training or follow-up training, then you have fidelity issues," Korenek-Johnson said.

As a long-term goal, they said the district should shoot for joining Kennewick in having 90 percent of Nome's third graders reading at the proficient level in three years. To get there, the teachers acknowledged there would need to be some structural changes in the school. School board President Karmun asked the teachers to continue to spread the message throughout the district. "Now's the time to educate," she said.

Nanook swimmers show up to swim at regionals

Submitted by Kirsten Bev

The Nome-Beltz High School swimmers traveled to Fairbanks for their regional swim meet this past weekend. Six schools participated in this regional - West Valley, Lathrop, North Pole, Monroe Catholic, Hutchison and Nome-Beltz.

Six of the seven Nanook swimmers qualified for finals in their events; most qualifying in the consolation finals (positions 7 to 12), so their swims did not count in team scores.

Nathan Blandford qualified in the top six in the 50 freestyle event and the 100 freestyle event. Nathan finished sixth in the 50 free and fifth in the 100 free. Nathan obtained personal best times in both these events in his preliminary races, swimming under 25 seconds in the 50 free and under 56 seconds in the 100 free. Devyyn Johnson qualified in the top six in the 100 Breaststroke, finishing fifth place in the finals. She also swam a personal best in the preliminary match of just over 1 minute and 21 seconds.

The boys' relay teams placed fourth in both of their events: the 200 medley relay and the 200 freestyle relay. The boys' team finished with 15 points and the girls' team finished with two points.

Miranda Murphy earned a personal best in the 50 freestyle event, finishing in 11th place. Jake Stettenbenz earned a personal best in the 50 freestyle event, finishing 12th. He also qualified for the finals in the 200 Individual Medley event, finishing 8th.

Nick Morgan significantly decreased his time in the 100 Backstroke over his time at the Palmer meet two weeks ago and finished in 12th place. Zach Sullivan also earned personal bests, significantly decreasing his times in the 100 backstroke and 100 breaststroke, finishing both of these events in 10th place.

Kaylene Evans participate in the meet but after swimming the 50 freestyle decided she was too sick to compete in any meaningful way, so she cheered the team from the bleachers.

The Nanook swimmers had a very successful season. Four new swimmers joined the team this year and as none are seniors, all are available to return next year.

Cold sores or herpes simplex virus can be a nuisance

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

The common "cold sore" is known for causing unsightly painful sores on the lip. Most often cold sores are merely a painful nuisance. But in the susceptible individual the virus that causes a cold sore can lead to life threatening problems.

days of a painful blister-like lesion that eventually crusts over. The worst discomfort occurs during the blistering stage, which normally lasts for 3-5 days.

A person with an active infection is contagious from the first sensations of tingling until the lesions crust over.

Cold sores, known formally as herpes labialis, are viral infections of the outer lip caused by the Herpes Simplex virus. The herpes virus that causes oral sores is only a distant cousin of the virus by the same name that causes genital infections.

The virus is most often caught early in life from sharing eating utensils, sharing cups or water bottles, or kissing a person with an active sore. The virus begins to cause a sore between one and three weeks after exposure.

The symptoms start as a tingling or burning sensation in the affected portion of the lip followed by several The Herpes virus that causes cold sores is unique because it never really goes away. After an outbreak, the virus lies dormant in one of the nerves of the lip waiting for an opportune time to flare. Most often this occurs during times of increased stress or during an unrelated viral infection, like a cold, thus the name "cold sore," or during an illness that causes fever. So it is sometimes called a "fever blister."

The herpes simplex virus can be dangerous for susceptible individuals including infants, elders, or those with underlying health conditions that suppress the immune system. In these individuals the virus may cause serious brain infections, called encephalitis, or eye infections leading to blindness. In people with severe eczema, the herpes virus can cause more severe skin infections.

The most important way people can prevent the spread of infection is to wash their hands frequently, avoid oral contact with others, and avoid sharing eating utensils until the sore completely resolves.

Treatment for occasional mild outbreaks is symptomatic. Topical over-the-counter numbing medicines like lidocaine and benzocaine may be used for temporary relief. Acetaminophen (Tylenol) or Ibuprofen (Advil or Motrin) may also be used for pain relief.

Often people find applying a cold compress or ice to the affected area offers temporary relief.

It is important to avoid picking, squeezing, or scratching active lesions because this can cause spread to other parts of the body or lead to a secondary bacterial infection.

Doctors treat more serious outbreaks of herpes labialis with one of three anti-viral medications: acyclovir (Zovirax), valaciclovir (Valtrex), or famcyclovir (Famvir). If started at the first sign of an outbreak, these medicines can shorten the duration of blisters and reduce the pain associated with active sores.

These medications are also helpful for reducing the frequency of outbreaks in people who have recurring cold sores.

You should consult your healthcare provider about an active cold sore if:

- Your symptoms are severe.
- You have an underlying health condition that has compromised your immune system.

- Your sores do not heal within 7-14 days.
 - Your sores recur frequently.
 - You have any eye irritation associated with an outbreak.

Cold sores can be annoying, but with a little prevention and early treatment, most people find outbreaks are manageable and do not interfere with daily life.

Lady Nanooks head to regionals

The Lady Nanook varsity volleyball squad split its final home matches of the season on Friday and Saturday against Dillingham.

Nome's win on Saturday was a come-from-behind victory after losing the first two games 13-25 and 17-25. The Nanooks came out fighting in the third game, winning 25-10. They narrowly grabbed the fourth game 25-23 and cinched the match in the fifth by 20-18.

Nome's win Saturday came on the heels of a 3-0 defeat on Friday. Dillingham opened the match with a deliberate 25-6 win. Nome was able to keep it closer in the next two games, but still lost 25-18 and 25-15.

The teams' junior varsity squads also played over the weekend. Dillingham took both the Friday and Saturday matches. Friday's match was a close affair with Dillingham winning 3-2. Dillingham took the first two games 25-21 and 28-26. Nome took the next two 23-25 and 16-25 only to lose the fifth and final match 15-7. Dillingham won Saturday's match 3-1. The Lady Nanooks JV squad took the first game 17-25 before Dillingham took the next three close contests 25-19, 25-23 and 25-21.

The Nome varsity team heads to Dillingham this weekend to compete in the Western Conference Girls Volleyball Tournament. Nome will first face Bethel at 6 p.m. Thursday. Other first-round games are Dillingham vs. Unalaska and Hooper Bay vs. Barrow. Kotzebue receives a first-round bye. The top two teams at the tournament will advance to state.

Write-ins

voters a list identifying approved write-in candidates. The list had the names, their party affiliation and the registration status with the division.

Election officials say they were trying to provide voter assistance and they asserted their authority to hand out a list of write-in candidates and their party under the division's statutory obligation to assist voters. The Alaska Supreme Court ruled that if a voter requests a write-in list and assistance in spelling a name, handing out a write-in list is permissible. "We conclude that when a voter requests assistance in casting a write-in vote and that request for assistance cannot be addressed by the posted general instructions for completing a writein ballot, the assistance provided to the voter must be related to and commensurate with the voter's request," the decision document reads.

The Supreme Court however agreed with the Democratic and Alaska Republican parties that party affiliation should be prohibited because it would not be necessary to address the voter's request for assistance.

The Supreme Court also dismissed its previous order that told the Division of Elections to mark and segregate ballots by early voters who used the write-in lists. "We are very disappointed with this decision. We continue to believe that election rules must be followed in order for the public to have confidence in the impartiality of the election process," said Patti Higgins, chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

On Saturday, conservative radio show host Eddie Burke-who ran for lieutenant governor-Harold Rudolph Sr., April Pugh, Greg Pugh and Kevin Hite filed a federal lawsuit contesting the state Supreme Court's decision. The lawsuit alleges that in providing write-in lists, the state has changed its rules for holding elections and did so without receiving the required approval of the U.S. Department of Justice.

LOCAL

While the courts sort out the legalities of voting and what information voters should be allowed to have, Miller supporters began to flood the list of senatorial candidates by filing bogus write-in candidacies. A search on the database of the Division of Election shows that since last week, 198 new write-in names have been added to the senatorial race. Many were found ineligible; some had the same last names.

The spike in write-ins came after Anchorage KFQD radio show host Dan Fagan had encouraged Miller supporters to run as write-ins to cause what he called "operation Alaska chaos" to confuse the write-in list. Given Friday's Supreme Court ruling, all of these names are now going to be on a list that can be obtained by voters who request it at the polls. Fenumiai, director of the Division of Elections, said all those found eligible have a right to be on the list if they successfully filed to run as write-ins.

How write-ins are counted

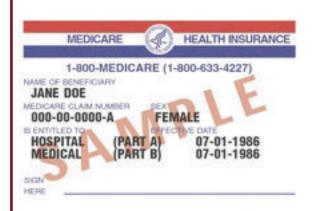

Fenumiai described in an interview with The Nome Nugget the process of counting write-in ballots. On election night, the ballots are counted and if the total number of write-ins is higher than ballots cast for any other candidate or if write-in ballots are very close to the race's winner, the division will launch a count of the write-in ballots by name. "In order for results on individual write-in candidates, write-in ballots would have to receive the most votes or can be second, but the difference between the top vote-getter and the write-in must be only one half of a percent," Fenumiai said.

If Murkowski does not come within this one half of a percent bracket, and if the result is not challenged in court, there won't be any chance to find out how many people cast their ballots for her.

If write-ins rise to the level of being counted by individual name, the counting won't start until Nov. 18. Fenumiai said that by then absentee ballots and questioned ballots have to be counted. A questioned ballot is when a voter cannot be identified at a polling place, or if the name is not on the precinct register. The questioned ballots are then sent to a regional office and are reviewed by a board, which tries to identify the person and his or her eligibility to vote.

And how would a recount request work? "After the election is certified, a losing candidate or 10 qualified voters can request a recount," Fenumiai said. The recount is free of cost to the person who requested it if the difference between winner and second place is 20 or fewer votes. If the difference is more than 20, the person who requests a recount has to shell out $15,000 for a statewide recount.
