Salmon enhancement planning panel meets in Nome

By Sandra L. Medearis

A fisheries advisory body is taking a measured and considered look at establishing a hatchery in the Norton Sound region to enhance dwindling fish runs.

Enhance is a key word, as state policy is to use hatcheries to supplement wild stock, not to replace wild stock—building them where there are no or few salmon already.

Norton Sound/Bering Strait Regional Planning Team met Nov. 25 to continue to pool expertise, experience and public comment to update a regional comprehensive salmon plan (CSP). Such a plan guides all salmon fishery activities within a region.

The group has held meetings in eight to 10 Norton Sound villages to collect suggestions and concerns. The CSP has the task to make commercial fishers, sports fishers and subsistence gatherers as happy as possible with a balance of interests.

The group comprises representatives from Northern Bering Sea Regional Aquaculture Association, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game and ex officio Kawerak representative Rose Fosdick. Other participants attended from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. village representatives and members of the public interested in the plentitude of subsistence resources.

“Where we spin out is what we do next,” said Sam Rabung, ADF&G and the Regional Planning Team chairman.

There is little agreement on what caused reduced salmon resources—overfishing, mismanagement, weather, disappearing or altered habitat.

People speaking at the meeting knew one thing for sure—they wanted the salmon harvestable surpluses to grow for commercial livelihoods, sport fishing and certainly and surely for subsistence usage.

Harvestable surplus means more than numbers of fish, according to several persons’ comments.

“Harvestable surplus is a hard number to find; if it is raining, the surplus is really not harvestable,” said Tim Smith.

Rain sabotages fish drying racks.

“There should be input in the plan on how subsistence works,” Rose Fosdick said. “It’s not just numbers, but where people want to catch them.”

“I want to see more subsistence information,” Charley Lean, biologist, said—not just commercial.

Several didn’t think there was enough emphasis in the draft CSP. Unlike regions farther south, fishing around northwest and western Alaska is all about subsistence.

Subsistence harvesters are ready to cooperate, said Perry Mendenhall.

“Our People—we don’t bring a sword. We want to bring the spirit of cooperation to whatever is decided here,” he said. “We want to cooperate with you so our kids can enjoy

Nome celebrates Kaatiluta

By Diana Haecker

On the last day of November, proclaimed by President Barack Obama to be national Native American Heritage month, Nomeites celebrated their diverse Native cultures with the second annual Kaatiluta. Under the motto “Celebrating who we are together” Bering Straits Foundation’s Moriah Sallafie spearheaded the organization of the event.

Kawerak, Northwest Campus, Nome Eskimo Community, Nome Public Schools, and the Nome Cultural Planners group all chipped in to support the event.

The Nome Rec Center was packed to the rafters to first partake in a potlatch style dinner with reindeer soup, baked fish and other regional delicacies. After the tables were cleared, the Inupiaq Choir performed.

Then it was time for the drums to sound throughout the Rec Center. Dancers dressed in their finest kuskpuks and dancing mukluks told stories of hunting success, of ravens, walrus and even couples kissing. The dances were serious at times, but some were infused with humor that had the audience laughing out loud. First in the lineup of three dance groups were the Nome-Beltz High School Cultural Dance Group. Next came the Savoonga Drummers and Dancers, followed by the King Island Drummers and Dancers.

NovaCopper in early stages to plan mine near Ambler

By Diana Haecker

NovaCopper Inc., a spinoff of the Canadian gold exploration company NovaGold Resources Inc., is in the planning stages to a develop mines at the Upper Kobuk, near Kobuk, Shungnak and Ambler.

The holdings are known as the Upper Kobuk Mineral Projects.

In July, NovaCopper released a preliminary economic assessment of the Arctic deposit and said the deposit yields – before taxes – an estimated value of $619 million to $1.4 billion, depending on commodity prices.

Who is NovaCopper?

NovaCopper is a spinoff company from its Canadian parent NovaGold Resources Inc. Spinoff is a business term that describes the creation of an independent company through the sale of new shares by a parent company. NovaCopper’s president and CEO is Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse, the former president and CEO of NovaGold when the company attempted to transform from an exploration company to a gold producer. NovaCopper was incorporated in 2011 as a wholly owned subsidiary of NovaGold. In 2012, NovaGold distributed all of the issued and outstanding common shares of NovaCopper to its shareholders, which is no longer a wholly owned subsidiary of NovaGold.

The team that heads NovaCopper now is under the same management as NovaGold was when the Rock Creek gold mine and mill complex near Nome were built and shortly after completion the mine shut down.

“This highly experienced management team has a proven track record of building substantial shareholder value through discovery and resource expansion of major mineral deposits in North America at the Donlin Gold project in Alaska and the Galore Creek project in British Columbia. The management team is planning to do it again with our new company, NovaCopper, in the Ambler mining district,” said Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse in a press release.

“NovaCopper expects to continue its track record of adding significant

The Bornite deposit, north of Kobuk, is located on NANA land. Exploration work at Bornite as well as work to further a feasibility study at Arctic has been done this summer. Earlier this year, NovaCopper has entered into an agreement with NANA Regional Corporation.

Dear Editor

The governor is not willing to go forward with the Medicaid expansion because it is not the program that he wants. We all know that the governor has done all that can be done to get the oil companies as much money as possible. Perhaps an exchange can be made where the working poor would send in their dividend checks to the governor so that he could turn them over to the oil companies in exchange for their Obamacare. In this manner the governor would have the program that he wants, the oil companies would get the needed cash to do what they want and the working poor would get Obamacare. This would be a win, win, win program that would fill everyone's needs. If things stay the way they are, then no one will get what they want or need.

Oh, Please Spare Us

Just when we think we've heard it all, something even weirder comes along. We have become accustomed to the mindless driveltalk folks post on their Facebook accounts. With Tweets and Twitters we suffer the instant gratification of knowing what someone has had for breakfast—like we really care. Social media and networking can be a good thing because it keeps us connected and informed, or ill informed, as the case may be. However, there comes a point where there is too much information—TMI!

Recently the airlines have said they will think about allowing passengers to use cell phones in flight. Imagine being the passenger in the middle seat with someone else's elbows digging into your ribs on both sides. Suppose the passenger by the window has his phone at full volume and is shouting in a nasal screech about what color to paint the bathroom and the passenger in the aisle seat is having amorous conversation with the person who is to pick them up at the airport. It would be worse than a screaming baby. Now there is another technological mind bender. Folks can record their dreams and even post them on Facebook. This could be our worst nightmare. It's scary. Folks have enough trouble telling fact from fiction. "In your wildest dreams," takes on a new meaning.

Oh for the days when a cell phone didn't ring out an annoying Beethoven's Fifth in church or in a meeting. Wouldn't it be nice to have a day without the trivia of social media? If the airlines let us use cell phones in flight they should provide a soundproof phone booth somewhere next to the toilets. Social media is great, but sometimes enough is more than enough. — N.L.M. —

"Often we have given professionals a lot of say in this. Now we are our own representation. We want credence and to participate," Mendenhall said.

Funding

In 1995, ADF&G discontinued the Fisheries Rehabilitation, Enhancement and Development Division (FRED program). The program aimed at rehab and enhancement of sockeye-producing lakes. The program began in 1971, but in 1993 it merged with the Commercial Fisheries Division and was defunded by declining revenues in 1995.

Shortly after FRED's formation, it provided funding to the ADF&G to construct hatchery projects across the state and to staff them.

Nowadays, fishery stakeholders must raise and provide money to fund projects.

Lack of funding is a major impediment. Processes of permitting and reviewing projects follow getting funding.

"We are here to bless projects," Tom Gray, Northern Bering Sea Regional Aquaculture Assoc. Director said. "In this region, communities need to put forth projects.

"I've been screaming about fish on my river, but I haven't brought forth a project," Gray said.

The responsibility must be shared, according to Tim Smith.

"The people responsible [for management] allowed it to happen. We don't know why exactly, but it is all of us."

Sen. Donny Olson got money into the ADF&G budget for four projects in the Norton Sound region—all contract projects meaning ADF&G could not do the work itself in-house.

Even with funding, solutions are elusive:

- A project with NSEDC for a South River (Unalakleet River) Chinook restoration project. The run was so weak that the project was not viable.

- A project with Native Village of White Mountain for a Niukluk (Fish River) Chinook restoration project—also not viable because of the weak Chinook run.

- Two chum rehabilitation projects on the Solomon, Snake and Nome rivers failed for lack of personnel or for equipment failure.

Because of lack of funds for updating the CSP, last spring the consensus was to use the existing CSP as a starting point and update it with current information rather than to start from scratch. The aim was to put current information into the existing CSP and provide the draft to the Regional Planning Team in April. Community meetings have been held in a number of villages for input, concerning potential projects.

The RPT reviewed, edited and provided input at the Nov. 25 meeting.

The consensus, again, was to put more emphasis on subsistence.

But don't forget commercial fishing, folks said.

Eric Osborne began fishing commercially in 1979 and watched fishing go under, so he could no longer make a living at it, he said.

He would say to Rep. Don Young, "Why don't we have a string of hatcheries from Adak to the Arctic? If you don't believe in hatcheries, then step aside," Osborne declared.

After public survey and public comment for guidance, the will plan go further up the ladder, Rabung said.

However, the plan is a plan, according to Rabung, and has no legal bearing.

The plan is built in terms of harvestable surpluses.

"Let the survey and public comment strengthen the call for subsistence in the plan, John Lindeman, ADF&G regional supervisor, commercial fisheries said.

The RPT set the outreach meetings to have region by region input with the goal to craft a plan that met the needs of the users.

The plan could help evaluate proposed projects to see if they meet the needs of users, according to Rabung.

value with exploration success," states NovaCopper's website.

NovaGold — now concentrating on developing the Donlin Creek Gold mine near the Kuskokwim River — has since substantially lost share value. This year, at its 52-week low, shares fell to $1.90. The 52-week high was at $5.03. In contrast to this year's share values, NovaGold's stocks hovered around $16 in 2007 before steadily declining.

In 2006, NovaGold and its shareholders fended off a hostile take-over attempt by the world's biggest gold producer Barrick Gold which offered shareholders a cash offer of $16 per share. Barrick Gold was the largest NovaGold shareholder, owning 13.6 million shares for a 14.8 percent stake in the company. But Barrick's attempt to buy NovaGold for $1.71 billion failed in December 2006.

Barrick then sold its entire stake in NovaGold. NovaGold Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuysse rejected Barrick's offer because he deemed it too low.

Rock Creek legacy

Regarding the Rock Creek mine at Nome, NovaCopper vice president corporate communications Patrick Donnelly said that lessons were learned from the failure to produce gold at the Rock Creek mine and mill after everything was built. "Starting it up took longer than expected, and then the global financial crisis came into play as the company needed more money," Donnelly said in a recent phone interview with The Nome Nugget. Donnelly was not with NovaGold when Rock Creek was put into maintenance and care status in 2008.

He said the main issue back in 2008 was that NovaGold had too many balls in the air, juggling with bringing the Rock Creek mine online and into production, and furthering their interests at Donlin Creek and the Galore project in British Columbia.

How will the company deal with the more complicated hurdles to reach the Ambler Mining District?

The Dept. of Transportation build a 3.75-mile road to the Rock Creek mine, the first completed road to resources. Power was readily accessible as Nome Joint Utilities built a pole line out to the mine and had the mill hooked up to the Nome power system.

To get to the Ambler mining district will not be as easy. AIDEA champions the cause to find an investor who would build, operate and maintain a private, industrial, 220-mile road from the Dalton Highway to the Ambler Mining District. According to the NovaCopper's prefeasibility study, a line item of $9.7 million is budgeted for toll fees per year.

To build and operate a mine at the Arctic deposit, NovaCopper would also need a power source capable to produce 15 MW. Donnelly said the prefeasibility study assumed that diesel generators would supply the power at the camp, but that AIDEA is also looking at the possibility of building a LNG gas line if a trans-Alaska LNG line would be built from the North Slope to bring the liquefied natural gas to market or to consumers in Alaska.

"We learned valuable lessons," Donnelly said in regards to Rock Creek. "In this case now, we only have one project to focus on; we don't have any other commitments," he said.

NANA is on board

NANA Regional Corporation owns and manages the surface and subsurface rights to some portions of the Upper Kobuk Mineral Projects.

NovaCopper and NANA signed a cooperative and long-term agreement in 2011 that consolidates landholdings for polymetallic exploration and development.

Former NovaGold Ambler project leader Larry Miller now works as the vice president of Natural Resources at NANA, also overseeing the Ambler project. The agreement gives NANA the option to become a joint-venture partner or to receive a net proceeds royalty once any mining operations are established.

NovaCopper promised local hire of NANA shareholders and contractors. The agreement also gives rights for NovaCopper to lease lands for mining operations. NANA would receive payments and net smelter return royalties in exchange for mineral rights and surface use for mine-related infrastructure and facilities. The agreement also creates an oversight committee with equal representation from NovaCopper and NANA to review plans and activities on the project; to create a scholarship fund to promote education for youth in the region; and to create a sustainability committee to protect subsistence and the Iñupiaq way of life.

Proposed mine

The Ambler Mining District encompasses several deposits containing copper, zinc, lead, gold and silver. The area that NovaCopper is focusing on is the Arctic deposit, along the upper Kobuk River Valley northwest of the village of Kobuk.

A second deposit that NovaCopper has interest in is called Bornite located due north of Kobuk.

For the development of the Arctic deposit, NovaCopper proposes an open pit mine, a minimum 12-year mine life, and a maximum 11,000 tons per day conventional grinding mill and flotation circuit to produce copper, zinc and lead concentrates with gold and silver as by-product.

Initial costs are $882 million to build and operate the mine at Arctic deposit.

Donnelly explained that copper is a fundamental commodity needed by industry.

"It's in your house, your car, your phones," he said.

Donnelly added that copper is increasingly hard to find in good quality. "The easy stuff has been mined and has been taken. In our case, we have indications of a high grade copper," he said.

Donnelly said the mine would produce a concentrate of copper, lead and zinc at the mill. The concentrate would then be loaded onto trucks to be taken on the industrial toll road to Fairbanks and on to a ship terminal at Point MacKenzie for shipping to smelters in Japan, Korea or China.

According to Donnelly, the timeline is to get through the prefeasibility stage and to begin a more detailed feasibility study next year, which will take one to two years to complete.

plete. Once that hurdle is cleared and things still look good, the permitting process would begin, which takes another three years. “At the earliest, construction may begin in 2018 or 2019,” Donnelly said. Construction of the mine and mill would take another two years at least to be completed and the mine, in theory, could be online in 2020 or 2021.

Donnelly said that after the deposit at Arctic has been mined out, the Bornite deposit would add another ten to 20 years to mining activity at the Upper Kobuk. “Once Arctic is exhausted, there will still be jobs for generations there,” Donnelly said.

He added that during meetings, the question of jobs comes up a lot. “People want to know when we go in production, they want jobs,” he said. But the company also hears about subsistence issues and fears that industrial-strength mining may upset the balance that allows subsistence hunters and fishers to live off the land. “The subsistence lifestyle is important. Will the mine affect that? We don’t think it will, it shouldn’t,” Donnelly said.

NovaCopper has been holding community meetings, the latest two weeks ago at the community of Allakaket. The village is about 25 miles away from where the road to Ambler would cross. Although Donnelly said that folks at the villages ask him about jobs, Allakaket second chief with the tribal council P.J. Simon told The Nome Nugget that the road and the proposed development is not welcome there. He said his concerns are for the southern Brooks Range and the boreal forest.

He calls it the lungs of the planet. “I’m also worried about the caribou herd, that’s one of our food sources,” Simon said. He also worries about the road’s impact on the spawning grounds of shee fish, white fish and salmon, and on the Dall sheep.

The city of Bettles, the tribe of Evansville and the tribes of Allakaket and Alatna have passed resolutions opposing the proposed road to Ambler.

“It’s a bad thing, we don’t need another road,” he said. The fear, he said, is that eventually, the road would be opened to the public. Then subsistence hunting would have to compete with more hunters and anglers adding to the hunting pressure on game and fish. “We got a lot to lose. We got our salmon, caribou and the sheep to lose,” Simon said.

This week the Western Arctic Caribou Herd working group is holding their annual meeting in Anchorage. On Thursday, the group will hear presentations on the Road to the Ambler Mining District by AIDEA, Bureau of Land Management, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, National Park Service, Teck and also Ron Yarnell from the Brooks Range Council.

Resistance

NovaCopper’s Donnelly said the company visits the villages in the Kobuk valley twice a year to keep the residents informed. Still, residents like PJ Simon and others feel that balanced information is hard to come by.

John Gaedecke, who was born and raised at Iniakuk Lake at the slopes of the southern Brooks Range, helped start an organization called the Brooks Range Council to “defend from industrialization the lands that define us, that we rely upon, and that we hope to enjoy long into the future.”

Gaedecke’s parents built a wilderness lodge at the lake and he is still using it for an ecotourism business of organized hiking, dog sledding and camping tours. In an interview with The Nome Nugget, he said that the purpose of the Brooks Range Council is to become educated on the issues and to share the information with local communities who will be impacted by both the road and the proposed mine.

He said the magnitude of the development proposal is staggering and Plane crash near St. Mary's kills pilot and three passengers

By Diana Haecker

A commercial Cessna 208 flying from Bethel to St. Mary's and Mountain Village crashed four miles outside of St. Mary's on Friday, Nov. 29.

Four people died in the crash. The plane was a Hageland flight, operated by Era Aviation.

According to the Alaska State Troopers, pilot Terry Hanson, 68, Richard Polty, 65, of Mountain Village; Rose Polty, 57, of Mountain Village, and five-month old baby Wyatt Coffee, of Mountain Village were killed in the wreck.

The six survivors are Melanie Coffee, 25, of Mountain Village/Pilot Station; Kylan Johnson, 14, of Mountain Village; Pauline Johnson, 37, of Mountain Village; Shannon Lawrence; Tanya Lawrence, 35, of Mountain Village; and Garrette Moses, 30 of Mountain Village.

The plane left Bethel at 5:40 p.m. and headed to Mountain Village and St. Mary's. According to Era Aviation director of sales and marketing Steve Smith, the plane's route was to go to Mountain Village first and then on to St. Mary's. Hageland Aviation President Jim Hickerson said in a statement that the airline was advised at 6:34 p.m. that the Cessna 208 had crashed approximately four miles from the St. Mary's airport.

When the plane went down, the emergency beacon was triggered. In St. Mary's, people noticed that the plane was overdue, Smith said. "They notified our corporate office and then we initiated the emergency protocol," said Smith.

Around 7 p.m., Troopers received a report that the plane flying the Era operated Hageland flight 1453 was unaccounted for. The Rescue Coordination Center was notified and the Troopers launched search and rescue protocol.

According to AP reports, one of the six survivors, Melanie Coffee, mother of Wyatt Coffee, called the health aide in St. Mary's from her cell phone while she gave CPR to her baby son at the crash site. Help came too late for the child. Melanie Coffee then walked through dense fog to find help. She found a search party and guided them to the plane wreck.

The wreckage was located near St. Mary's at 8:30 p.m. According to AST spokeswoman Megan Peters, two Troopers on snowmachines, local search and rescue volunteers, the U.S. Coast Guard, RCC and LifeMed Alaska responded. The Coast Guard launched a C-130 Hercules airplane and a Jayhawk helicopter but stood down because LifeMed reached the accident site before them and transported the crash survivors out of the area. According to Peters, two people suffered from critical injuries.

As of press time, the cause of the crash has not yet been determined.

Era's marketing director Steve Smith said that the pilot, Terry Hanson, has been flying for the company for one year.

Smith said Era has arranged for families of the survivors to travel and stay in Anchorage to be near the injured while they recover at hospitals.

"We have no way of knowing what happened and what caused the accident," Smith said.

Hageland posted a phone number (1-888-705-7560) on the company's website to call for more information about flight 1453.

Investigators from the National Transportation Safety Board flew to St. Mary's to investigate the crash over the weekend.

As of press time on Monday, the NTSB has not yet cleared the scene and is still in St. Mary's investigating the crash site.

that the plans that have been presented to the tribe and community at Allakaket show that there are still big holes in them.

Gaedecke said that people liked the idea of a public road at first, but then changed their minds. In Bettles, a resolution to support the road was rescinded and replaced with a resolution against it.

"We're already seeing more helicopters, survey crews and scientists in the field than ever before," he said.

Gaedecke reiterated the concerns that PJ Simon voiced: worry about the impacts that industrialization has on wilderness and on people's wild food sources. He also said that the numbers being tossed around to building an industrial road are not realistic. "I don't think $440 million is enough money to build the road," he said. "You have to build bridges over 12 to 13 major rivers and it's challenging country."

While the project was under the DOT's roof, the state legislature has appropriated $9.25 million between 2011 and 2013 toward the project.

In April, the 2013 Alaska Legislature approved an additional $8.5 million for AIDEA designated for the road to Ambler project.

In a report published in March 2012, Lois Epstein, an engineer with The Wilderness Society, said that the state administration does not show fiscal restraint as mega projects such as the road to the Ambler Mining District, the Umiat road or a western access corridor to Nome are being funded from the state's general fund.

The report documented that the State of Alaska spent $133.4 million of mostly federal money on planning for five expensive and controversial road and bridge projects that have not been built.

"The projects do not have financial plans identifying how they will be paid for, nor has the state quantified expected resource-related revenue associated with them," Epstein wrote in 2012. "Additionally, the state has not identified where the funding for road maintenance and preservation would come from."

Epstein wrote that the state has not provided the legislature or the public with adequate justification for why these three expensive projects should be higher priorities than other state needs.

But money flows where intention goes.

Philosophical differences between resource development proponents and proponents of maintaining wilderness for the sake of subsistence and preservation surface are inevitable.

NovaCopper's Patrick Donnelly said that there are always a few groups that are against development.

"You always get environmentalists that give out a lot of wrong information," Donnelly said. "You have to be upfront with people and willing to address the difficult questions. I think we're clearing up those questions," he said.

On the other hand, PJ Simon of Allakaket doesn't feel he got a lot of information out of the meetings in November.

In prior conversations, he added, state DOT engineers had a hard time understanding why residents of communities off the road system prefer to stay off the road system. "This man asked me, 'So, you want to live in isolation?' I said, 'No, it's not like we're living in a cave. We want to live here because it's pristine. We understand perfectly well what's going on,'" Simon said.

Ad with Maryland actress posing as Alaska voter illustrates need for federal campaign finance transparency

ANCHORAGE: Tuesday Dec. 3 State Senator Hollis French and Representative Les Gara announced new legislation regarding disclosure of campaign ad funding. Following the Citizen's United decision, Senator French and Representative Gara championed a state law that requires disclosure of ad funders, but federal laws do not require such transparency. The Koch-funded organization Americans for Prosperity has spent over $100,000 on television ads in which a woman criticizes the Affordable Care Act and Senator Begich. Though the woman implies she is from Alaska, media reports revealed she actually is an actress from Maryland. Senator French and Representative Gara will discuss the need to reform federal campaign disclosure regulations, and how federal disclosure standards are far less transparent than regulations affecting state elections. "People have a right to know when outside corporations are using fake Alaskans to attack a real Alaskan," said Rep. Gara, who went on to note "that's why Senator French and I worked together to help pass Alaska's disclosure laws. Senator Begich tried to do the right thing in Congress but the GOP filibustered his efforts. When corporations and outside billionaires fund attack ads, that should not be hidden from the public." During the last election cycle, the Koch brothers' "secret bank" spent $250 million on attack ads and other electioneering activities. Since Senate Republicans filibustered the DISCLOSE Act, the funders of those ads remained anonymous. Americans for Prosperity, American Energy Alliance, and Heritage Action are some of the Koch front groups that already have run negative, misleading attack ads in Alaska in 2013. The Koch brothers appear to be targeting Alaska this election cycle, and are expected to spend millions of dollars on more attack ads.

to be, highly disruptive to the state's economy, ecosystems, and communities; and it would be irresponsible of us to continue to ignore this threat. We desperately need a methodical, well-funded, robust response from state government.

In 2006, with the leadership of Senator Olson and then Rep. Joule, the Alaska Legislature established the Alaska Climate Impact Assessment Commission. And in 2007, Gov. Palin then established the Alaska Climate Change Sub-Cabinet. This was all a good start.

However, in the past four years, these efforts have faltered. The legislature's climate commission ended in 2008. The administration's Climate Sub-Cabinet last met three years ago, and has essentially been terminated.

(www.alaskadispatch.com/.../governor-should-renew-alaskas-leadership-role-climatechange-response).

The administration has yet to confirm that any of the recommendations of the former sub-cabinet or the Alaska Climate Change Strategy have been implemented. The legislature's Arctic Policy Commission is a worthwhile endeavor, but not sufficient to provide the consistency and level of response by state government to climate change impacts that will be required in coming years. We desperately need a robust response to climate change impacts from our state government. The Alaska Legislature needs to make this a priority issue in the upcoming legislative session.

This week, I proposed to all Alaska legislators that they introduce and pass legislation in the upcoming session to develop a robust state response to climate change impacts and risks. To aid the legislature's consideration or the request, I provided them with a draft bill entitled the "Alaska Climate Change Response Act (ACCRA) of 2014," with two principal components:

First, ACCRA would establish the Alaska Office on Climate Change to provide coordination of all state efforts to respond to climate change in Alaska and to assist Alaska citizens, communities, and industries to prepare for and adapt to the risks and impacts of climate change. As envisioned, this Office would lead, coordinate, and fund efforts of state government to implement the 2010 Alaska Climate Change Strategy, and other necessary responses to climate impacts including assistance to western and northern Alaska villages in their efforts to respond to the many impacts.

Second, ACCRA would establish the Alaska Climate Change Response Fund from a nominal 10¢ per barrel equivalent assessment on oil, gas, and coal produced in Alaska, modeled on the state's oil spill fund. At today's production levels, this would collect from $20 million - $30 million per year. The Fund would be used to support the Alaska Office on Climate Change, its implementation of the Alaska Climate Change Strategy, research, and other efforts deemed necessary and appropriate to achieve the goals of the Alaska Office on Climate Change and the Alaska Climate Change Strategy. This will include substantial financial assistance to western and northern Alaska communities. We simply can't continue to expect that the federal government will pick up the entire tab for the needs of our Alaska communities. We need to build this state financial capability to do so.

The scientific community has done its job on this, and done it well. Now it's up to the policy makers — the legislature and administration — to implement what the scientific community has identified as reasonable mitigations and actions to respond to the impacts and risks.

Clearly, we owe at least this to the future generations of Alaskans.

Obituary

Ellen Blount 1922-2013

I want to take this opportunity to say thank you to all the people behind QCC/NSRH for the many years of excellent care my mother Ellen Blount enjoyed at QCC until her passing there on 11/22/13 from cancer.

The QCC nursing staff and CNAs took great care of my mother every day for years and many have become like family. During the last few days towards the end I was warmed by their dedication, personal involvement, and encouraging words. And to the staff dressing my mom in her pretty red dress with "little Chris" the teddy bear for her last journey you will always be in my mind.

Dr. Liu and mom had a great relationship and I thank Dr. Liu for the many medical discussions we have had over the years when we had to choose which way forward. You followed every wish of the family to the end and we appreciate that.

The night of mom's passing two persons dear to us came over at my request for the last time, Pastor Karen Sonray of the Lutheran Church as well as family friend Dr. Lawrence, both of whom led us in final prayers. Thank you for coming.

The final goodbyes were said a few days later next-door at the NSRH. I want to thank all three Social Services staff for their help and for making our final viewing very dignified – you had prepared everything beautifully and mom looked so peaceful.

As I watched mom slip away I had great support from my girlfriend Linda Gologergen without whom I could not have endured this pain.

And after she did a social posting I began receiving prayers and wishes on my phone from people from Gambell, Savoonga, Nome, and elsewhere. I clicked "Like" to each and every one and you gave me strength. Thank you.

That night Linda and I walked out of QCC for the last time. It was snowing heavily and the snowflakes were pretty in the strong parking area lights. Linda pulled me close and said: "Kiyaghneqhem tuumngi naagpek iqtii whaken nunameng. Nutaghameng anigumeng peghwghi, veghesti". As follows: "God is removing your mom's footprints from this world by covering them up with the soft snow". I looked back at QCC one more time and our footprints too were all covered up. I knew then that there was no return.

My mother's ashes will be spread outside of Nome next summer at her favorite place. —Christian T. Blount

Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. Karen Sonray, Our Savior Lutheran Church Member Nome Ministerial Association

Wait on the Lord. They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength. They shall mount on their wings like eagles. They shall run and not be weary. They shall walk and not faint. (Teach us Lord how to wait). Paraphrase of Isaiah 40: 31

As a child I can still remember waiting with expectation to see my grandmother get off the plane to visit us. It meant lots of smiles, hugs, good food and stories. I could hardly wait.

Waiting. It is not an attractive word. It seems boring. What if... you were waiting for something that would change your life? How would you get ready for it? Would you make yourself busy, filling your life with noise and distraction, rushing to get gratification? Would you spend all your time doing everything... but slowing down? No?

Well this is what we do every year. Each year we have an opportunity, to dramatically change our life. But most of the time we miss it. We spend our time running around, trying to get everything done in time, when most of us forget to get the most important thing ready—our attitudes and hearts.

Advent is all about slowing down and waiting. It begins four weeks before Christmas and includes the four Sundays before Christmas. Advent means "entry." We are preparing for the entry of someone very important in our lives!

In our society, this time of the year has often become associated with shopping, planning, baking, selling, buying, decorating, Santa and STRESSING! Advent asks you to try another way: slow down, wait and do not be anxious. You are asked to prepare but also realize ultimately it is God who brings Christmas and not you. What a freeing thought!

Advent reminds us that Christ enters our world. We don't bring down God's presence. God does that work! Our response is expectant waiting, hopeful anticipation and cheerful preparation for a welcome Guest! This guest is God who wants to break into our lives in all places, moments and times: past, future and present. That means commemorating the birth of Jesus, waiting for Christ's return and welcoming God into our lives every day.

The four weeks before Christmas are meant to prepare us for these events and remind us that there is JOY in WAITING. So, this Christmas season, remember the joy does not come in a race to see how much you can get done before December 25th. It's about waiting to welcome a very special guest into your lives, homes and heart. As you plan, decorate, shop, wrap gifts, attend parties remember you are waiting for a guest who brings you joy, hope, love and peace, so carve an empty space out for that guest in all you do!

NOTE: As a way of waiting I encourage you to attend selections from Handel's The Messiah which will be performed by the Community Chorus. This will get you into that expectant and inspired space! It is being performed free of charge on Sunday, Dec. 8, at 2 p.m. at Our Savior Lutheran Church.
