Study aims to reduce fuel oil use in remote Arctic

UAF FAIRBANKS— Researchers will study whether heaters that store renewable electric energy might substantially reduce fuel oil burned in remote Arctic homes, under a new project led by a University of Alaska Fairbanks team.

Curtailing fuel oil use in this way, along with energy efficiency improvements, could cut household energy costs and carbon emissions.

“Heating is a huge expense in Alaska, and we cannot afford to design electric power systems without considering how they can be co-optimized to serve heating needs,” said Jeremy VanderMeer, a research assistant professor at UAF’s Alaska Center for Energy and Power.

The UAF team will conduct energy-efficiency retrofits and install electric thermal storage heaters in homes in Kotzebue to assess their impacts on home energy use and costs.

Electric thermal storage heaters consist of a heating element and ceramic bricks in an insulated box. On demand, a fan blows air across the hot bricks and into the home.

Some electrical microgrids in remote Alaska communities use renewable energy, such as that generated by wind turbines. When excess renewably generated electricity is available, it can be dispatched to charge electric thermal storage heaters and sold at a discounted rate, thereby reducing heating costs.

In this way, electric thermal storage heaters can buffer fluctuations in renewable generation and allow utilities to increase such sources in their microgrids. So thermal storage, combined with improved home energy efficiency, could make the addition of renewable generation capacity the most cost-effective way to reduce fuel consumption.

“The broadscale adoption of a cost-effective combination of energy-efficient homes and low-cost, renewably generated electricity for space heating would be transformative, as it would substantially reduce residential sector carbon emissions and household energy costs,” said Dominique Pride, a research assistant professor of economics at ACEP and the lead researcher on the project.

The team will model Kotzebue’s microgrid to determine the most cost-effective combinations of energy efficiency retrofits, electric thermal storage heaters, electrical energy storage and renewable energy.

The team members will also analyze economics and policies to identify changes required to enable the widespread adoption of renewably generated electricity for space heating. They’ll study how statewide energy policies and programs can be adapted to be more equitable and effective.

Once the energy system model is developed, the team will teach Arctic residents how to apply it to reduce fuel oil consumption in communities beyond Kotzebue.

The team members will create a culturally responsive, place-based science curriculum on energy use in the Arctic for grades K-8. They’ll also provide energy efficiency and energy auditing training to high school students.

“We’re excited to accurately measure and document how resourceful people, energy-efficient buildings, and renewable electricity can all work together to cut costs and carbon emissions in remote communities,” said Steve Colt, a research professor of energy economics and policy at the ACEP.

The National Science Foundation funded the four-year project with a $3 million grant from its Navigating the New Arctic program.

NOTICE OF PRECINCT BOUNDARY AND POLLING PLACE CHANGES

The Amended Interim Proclamation of Redistricting makes changes and/or renumbers all 40 house districts within the state. Based on those changes, the Division of Elections has adopted regulations that depict the precinct boundaries. Precinct boundaries were changed to fit within the election districts established in the redistricting plan.

In addition to changing the precinct boundaries, the division assigned polling places to each precinct based on the changes to the precincts.

A copy of the precinct maps and a list of each precinct polling place is available by contacting one of the division’s regional offices listed below or on the division’s website at:

<https://www.elections.alaska.gov/Core/districtmaps.php>
<https://www.elections.alaska.gov/election-polls/>

New voter identification cards will be sent to all registered voters starting on July 13, 2022. The card identifies the house district, precinct number, and polling place for each registered voter.
